Intersectionality is a theoretical framework for understanding how aspects of a person's social and political identities (e.g., gender, race, class, sexual orientation, religion, disability, physical appearance, height, etc.) combine to create unique modes of discrimination and privilege. It's a way of seeing the world where identities overlap and create new experiences unique to each individual. It requires us to consider how different aspects of identity intersect and interact, and how these intersections affect our experiences in society. Intersectionality is important because it helps us understand how our experiences are shaped by more than one aspect of our identity at the same time. It's a complex and dynamic way of thinking about how our identities intersect and affect our lives.
